WORKPLACE VIOLENCE

According to Statistics Canada, 71% of the 356,000 violence related incidents that were reported in 2004 occurred in the workplace. A common misconception about workplace violence is that it is often thought to be a physical assault on a person. However, workplace violence has a much broader scope. In addition to physical attacks, workplace violence also includes harassment, verbal abuse, threats and threatening behaviour.

Violence can happen in any workplace - but in fact some workplaces, such as those that handle money or work with the public, are more susceptible. The effects of workplace violence can also be enormous, where a single incident of workplace violence can have life-altering consequences. As a result, ongoing changes in legislation are being implemented to help reduce the risk of violence-related incidents in the workplace.
